

Personal Reflection Exercises...

I strengthen my financial situation regardless of the economy.

I strengthen my financial situation regardless of the economy.

My business transactions are thriving. My money management principles prevent me from being affected by the economic crisis. Despite the reports and warnings about a wavering economy, my finances are improving.

I buy only what I can afford. I meet my needs and those of my family first. I use my leftover money to build my savings, make investments, and purchase things I desire. I stay away from buying items just to keep up with the Joneses.

My finances are flourishing because I am a giver, not a borrower. I give to others freely. When I am in need, I devise a plan to save enough money for the purchases I need to make, instead of buying things I cannot afford.

Giving myself time to establish savings prevents me from falling into the cycle of borrowing and staying in debt. Living by the principle of only buying what I can pay for frees me from the bonds of debt and causes my finances to thrive.

I look ahead with positivity, trusting that any economic setback is simply a temporary stage. My finances are on the rise regardless of what I see around me. I free myself from fear and financial stress so I can think clearly and make sound decisions.

My finances are improving one step at a time. I am patient with the process. In the meantime, I look for ways to reduce my debt and increase my sources of income.

Today I choose to rest on the arms of peace knowing that I am steadily strengthening my financial situation regardless of the economy.

Self-Reflection Questions:

1. Why is it necessary to be patient when building my savings?
2. Am I living within my means?
3. How can I improve my finances further in the next six months?
